

The public owns the television air waves, if I'm not mistaken, and when there are lots of owners of TV stations there is likely to be a balance of opinion floating around out there. The public is served. But when station ownership is allowed to be to be in the hands of a very few, the public may find itself unable to access viewpoints that conflict with viewpoints of the owner, and separating news from opinion and truth from fiction becomes very difficult if not impossible. The public is not served. Case in point, Sinclair is threatening to require it's many stations to air a clearly partisan program under the auspices of "News" and you, the FCC, protector of the public from abuses of public property, need to stop Sinclair. Perhaps this is a good time to address the danger the public is in and open up our airwaves to more competition.

Thank You,
Dan Connor
